Why terrorism is now permanent in Australia - Globalized Australia, Islamic Terror, Nick Kaldas And Counter-Terrorism Dr. Jim Saleam

THE present focus of the majority of Australians on the subject of Islamist terrorism on our own soil demands a clear response from Australia First Party, indeed an articulated response from all patriotic people.

It is our position that this terrorism will henceforth be continuous and will increase in intensity.

Why?

The terror attack recently in Sydney brought forward a line of commentary from Nick Kaldas, counter terrorism expert and New South Wales Deputy Commissioner of Police. Essentially, he was saying that the youth who carried out the murder was someone seeking attention and glamour and while he may have been manipulated into violence, he was more or less, just an anti social person.

Mr. Kaldas remarked: "I think obviously some - and I'm not a psychologist - but certainly in our experience, some kids who are gravitating towards this have latched onto it because there's a void in their life in some other space. Whether they lack role models, whether they lack a strong father figure: I really don't know about each particular case.

But the reality is: this has been sold to them and they have swallowed it in numbers by those who want them to do this sort of stuff. They've managed to paint it into a romantic adventure and they've embraced it."

Since then, this line has been widely repeated.

Half truths mean falsehood. It would be fair to say Mr. Kaldas understands the nuances within what he has said. It is the big truth we now need to discern in the shadows of official falsehood It is my initial concern that if Mr. Kaldas is a key source of the official response, then without understanding his overall political 'take', we really would miss the point.

Note that not too long ago at a Conference at the University of Western Sydney, Mr. Kaldas condemned Australians who may question immigration and multiculturalism as "white supremacists" and he placed them on the radar of political policing in Australia. There was the subtle hint that they might be on the path towards terrorism as well!

In fact, we were already aware of his views on this and related terrorism subjects. Long ago in politics, in 2009 actually, this writer said of him:

"Yet, contemporary political-policing in Australia is decidedly influenced by the counter-terrorism drive of 'Western' intelligence services. It shows physically in the person of Nick Kaldas who directed the New South Wales Counter-Terrorist Command Kaldas was considered Con't page 2

Reliable enough (sic) to have been seconded to Iraq in 2004 and 2005, where he assisted in training the puppet police services of the Baghdad occupation-regime and was of such significance to have played a role in the show-trial of the Iraqi dictator, Saddam Hussein, a process that actually resulted in what many jurists call his judicial-murder. Today, Kaldas serves in Lebanon, investigating the assassination of a senior politician, such that Israeli and American 'intelligence' may pin the killing upon Syria, a function that may prefigure war."

"In other words, in the very person of Nick Kaldas there is a suggestion that under his leadership of the New South Wales political police, the logic of counter-terrorism has imposed itself upon political policing generally; further, it could be equally concluded that their fight in Iraq against the national resistance is seen by Kaldas's controllers as the same thing as their struggle against patriotic dissident Australians. In one sense that is correct: each targets the New World Order system of economic and political and cultural globalisation, albeit on behalf of very different peoples and through rather different means. Whatever some Australians may think of this equation, the political police are in no doubt of its validity and proceed accordingly."

I can only say that when Mr. Kaldas speaks and acts, he speaks and acts with the force of the state.

In the raging Muslim terrorism debate in Australia and given the broad experience and knowledge of Mr. Kaldas, it is unlikely that neither he – nor the Australian Security Intelligence Organisation – have failed to miss the far broader issues behind the comments made above about the young killer in Sydney. Indeed, many ordinary people grumbled that Mr. Kaldas was being naïve and over-generous towards the killer; quite the contrary as we said, he was concealing a dark truth amidst a few facts about the psychology of adolescents.

For our part, we have arrived at a conclusion on the future nature of terrorism in Australia. We have no doubt that our counter terrorism agencies understand this too. They would be totally incompetent if they did not.

We say:

Any discussion of Islamist terrorism in Australia must begin with the obvious social, cultural and economic marginalization of Muslims. Back in 2005 after the Civil Uprising in Cronulla, which occasioned the reactive politically and racially motivated violence of Middle Eastern groups against white Australians, ASIO realized that its model of Islamic radicalization - was wrong. It would no longer be a matter of certain persons attending prayer halls and Mosques and learning of the supposed visionary message of Islam, 'radicalizing' in opposition to the 'enemies' of Islam and eventually becoming terrorists. Rather, it would be criminal, underemployed, long-term unemployed, anti-social and pure trash elements in the Middle Eastern communities who would embrace Islamism as an ideological explanation and 'answer' for their limited access to the goodies and 'respect' of Australian society. Their lack of social mobility and place and their rejection of any rules of fair conduct- would create the next generation of terrorists. And it did.

But from this moment in history on, we have entered a whole new stage in the social alienation of Muslims and the growth-factors of terrorism. With the passage of the Trans Pacific Partnership (TPP) and the soon-to-be China Australia Free Trade Agreement (ChAFTA), Australia will be uniformly globalized economically and given a new surface globo-culture demanding of general loyalty. Australia can only be increasingly Asianized in population terms. There is no real place in globo-land and in a Chinese controlled Northern Zone of Australia for the followers of Islam - except perhaps as cheap (refugee) labour on the plantations, or as casual or sweated workers in menial jobs in the big cities and larger towns. Even then, they will be heavily competed against by the armies of contract labour in the North and the body-hire companies, foreign students and so on - elsewhere. The essential ideological (religious) and social backwardness of the Muslim groups would at that point tell against them, creating new endemic resentments and hatreds. Why? Because the principles of Islam and the cultural backgrounds of these immigrant communities do not lend themselves to this new free market of technowizardry and financial manipulation, of specialized service industries and tourism, of trade centres and university cities. The Muslims will be further shut out of whatever wealth and fame, or access to whatever gizmos and fancy lifestyles as may be available to others. And we might note too that many of these 'others' will be arrogant colonizers who could just as easily regard the Muslims as cultural and non adaptive primitives.

The perception by Muslims of this as 'unfairness' would then be coloured by the presence of 'superior' Islamist ideology. After all, Islamism 'explains' (sic) the corruption of the social order, its satanic nature and the need for redemptive revolution. Jihadi activism would only expand through the Muslim wasteland suburbs on that basis.

It would follow Islamist terrorism could become a growth industry. The hatreds that Islamist groups had towards the 'former' Australian-European society (that will remain) would be generalized into an explosive desire to renew the Muslim community and ethos in fulsome terror.

In other words, we must suggest that Islamist terrorism in Australia is now permanent, that it cannot be bought off by community-centred games to advance 'inclusion' and 'tolerance' (although that will be tried) or dealt with by 'police methods'. If Islamist terrorism is one essential product of the very logic of Australia's new stage of globalist capitalism, it has a social and economic and cultural context. The two things are linked together in contradiction.

We may ultimately thank (sic) this new breed of terrorist for one thing. He will tear up the multiculturalist system and render globo-land dysfunctional. We Australian nationalists practice our own identity politics of ethnic defence and we are determined to prevail in the name of the historical Australian Nation.

Will the chaos caused by the new generation of Islamist terrorists and the cost borne by the state render the system susceptible, amidst its innumerable other infirmities (many unrecognized by both people and state), to overturn (?) – will be the real question for the next two decades.

Graphite’s Book review : The Wake – by Paul Kingsnorth

"And so the English groaned aloud for their lost liberty and plotted ceaselessly to find some way of shaking off a yoke that was so intolerable and unaccustomed"

- Orderic Vitalis (1075-c.1142) English chronicler and Benedictine monk, describing the aftermath of the invasion of England by the Norman French in 1066.

Introduction

IN September 1066, England was invaded by William, the Duke of Normandy. William defeated and killed the English king Harold at the Battle of Hastings on the 14th of October.

On Christmas Day 1066, William was crowned King of England in London, extinguishing the Saxon royal line forever.

So began what author Paul Kingsnorth describes as 'probably the most catastrophic single event' in England's history. Kingsnorth points out that the Norman invasion and occupation of England 'brought slaughter, famine, scorched-earth warfare, slavery and land confiscation to the English population, along with a new ruling class who had, in many cases, little but contempt for their new subjects. It wasn't until 1399, over three centuries later, that England again had a king who spoke English as his first language.'

The Story

The Wake tells the story of a small landholding English farmer - Buccmaster of Holland - in post-invasion Lincolnshire. 'Holland' in .in this case refers to a region of Lincolnshire, rather than the Netherlands. The story follows Buccmaster's thoughts and actions in the lead-up to the invasion, his response to it and his resistance to the 'ingenga' (invaders) afterwards.

The historical fact of Saxon resistance to the Norman invasion is not widely known, but it is well recorded. Several records exist, for example, of the life of Hereward the Wake – an 11th century leader of local resistance to the Norman invasion. Hereward's base was in the Isle of Ely and according to legend he roamed The Fens (including Lincolnshire) leading popular opposition to William the Conqueror. The Wake and it's characterisation of Buccmaster of Holland provide many parallels to the historical Hereward. The story also suggest a possible origin for the folk concept of 'green men' - with outlaws living wild in the forests. This idea reappears perennially in tales such as Robin Hood and perhaps explains the enduring appeal of rural folk-heroes, all the way through to Ned Kelly.

The Language

Buccmaster's tale is told in the first person and is written in what Kingsnorth describes as a 'shadow tongue' of his own making – a language that's meant to be understandable for contemporary readers of English, but also close enough to Old English to lend an atmosphere of authenticity to the work that wouldn't have been possible otherwise. The effect is enhanced by the plain and earthy language used by Buccmaster; furious at being treated like 'fuccan swine in our own land' and impatient with 'dumb folc' who do not see the reality of their situation, but would blithely 'harro and plough and drink and fucc like the blaec will nefer cum'

The effect of this use of language is double-edged. On the one hand, the story is certainly unique in its presentation of 11th century society - and the use of a language that's not-quite -English emphasises how different life was for the people of the time. Most reviewers of The Wake celebrate this enthusiastically on the grounds that it represents a novel literary approach. And that's true, although it's not one that goes without precedent. The Edinburgh grunge novels of Irvine Welsh (Trainspotting and others) use a similar technique – and are equally difficult to understand for the first time reader. Kingsnorth provides a useful glossary explaining the meaning of many of the words he uses, but if you don't realise it's there until you finish the book, it's possible to get over half way through before you work out what a 'fugol' is (it's a bird).

So The Wake is hard reading, at least until one becomes accustomed to the language.

Truth and Lies

Superficially, the story relates to themes of truth and deception, reality and self-delusion. Buccmaster is presented as a broken and flawed character who convinces himself of his own greatness, despite the evidence of his imperfection. He beats his wife for arguing with him, but after her death tells himself and others that he always treated her like a queen. He

The Greek Tragedy And The Rest Of The World Helping To Save The Private Banks

Allan R. Jones

THE Greek people have been experiencing first hand the result of government borrowing from private investment banks. By cooking the books to hide the real situation from the taxpayer and worker, the debt paralysis having originated from dealings with Goldman Sachs from 2001-5 which had helped cover up the extent of Greek debt due to derivative trading not being included into the national debt accounts.

Then Greek Prime Minister Lukas Papademos had negotiated currency swaps with Goldman Sachs, whereby the Euro was exchanged for US dollars by the Greek National Bank. The Greek government then sold bonds that paid high interest to those private banks which were insolvent in Europe before doing the Goldman Sachs currency swaps. This saved them at the expense of the Greek taxpayer and producer who had to pay increased taxes to pay the government bond coupon (interest) on those bonds.

The Greek government had used a type of derivative called currency swaps. In the case of Greece, the swaps were to earn interest on the dollar until 2019; however as the situation deteriorated Goldman Sachs sold back the troubled bonds to the Greek National bank, a bank that supported only private banks in Greece.

Derivatives Cooked Greece, and Residential Mortgage Backed Securities have the potential to cook Our Economy

In Australia in 2007-9 the bankers, local councils, and others, who collect money from the taxpayer to carry out "services", thought it more profitable to squander the public savings and invest in Residential Mortgage Backed Securities (RMBS) - as flogged by greedy investors in America who told the sellers to unload the junk bonds on "dumb Aussies" and many other countries including Greece, Spain, Portugal, Italy, France, and UK.

What has followed is a cover up in Australia as the story was told that this country avoided the Great Financial Crisis, (GFC). In fact, much of the debt that was incurred during this time, lies buried in silence except for a few reports on the pages of The Age and Sydney Morning Herald. Other sources about the actual debt are found in the records of the Federal Reserve Bank of America, and in the files of the Office of Financial Management in Australia.

The debt that Australia incurred at that time has also gone unreported. We do not know how much of it has been repaid and some of the US bailout funds channelled to the Reserve Bank of Australia, were to be on very short term. According to records, the interest cost to taxpayers cannot be established. Surely China did not lend to Australia $42 Billion dollars at rates that Australia received from the Federal Reserve Bank of America at the time either?

Some borrowing figures are to be found after diligently searching for them, while the national news media including the public national broadcaster ABC ran documentaries on "what makes Australia great" and "The Killing Season" where both of these pieces of hype claim that Australia had avoided the GFC. In fact people like Peter Costello former treasurer claimed that Australian banks "didn't lose a cent during the GFC".

This is very misleading from Peter Costello. It may well be the private banks in Australia did not lose a cent, as this was the strategy, but how about the taxpayers and workers in Australia, did they lose any money? It would seem certain that they did as the imposition of austerity in this country is starting to resemble the Greek austerity, and this is the point. Is there a cover up in Australia of the cost of the GFC? We know for certain that there was a lot of bailout activity put into place, and there is no such thing as a free lunch from foreign lenders.

If we avoided the GFC, why is it that the Liberal Party is now blaming the Labor Party for the spending during the time of the GFC and that this has added so many billions to the federal budget deficit? Indeed it was this spending that actually helped the country pull out of what could have been quite a problem, and a bigger problem mainly for the private banks in Australia.

Today the Liberal politicians and the media are engaged in trying to tell the Australian people that the budget deficit has produced a situation where it will have to suffer austerity measures. They say it is the public's fault for claiming too many entitlements, which will have to be stripped away bit by bit, and as much as the public will tolerate, while they also dig up muck on the Labor Opposition by having commissions of inquiry into union practices - to lower wages.

What is not understood here is the puppet pantomime that is taking place. The Labor Party is not going to reveal the extent of the bailout that happened during the GFC, and neither is the Liberal Party, or the Greens, because if they did the true amount of debt that governments have incurred would be revealed and the public would not be so docile about any application of austerity measures of which there are more to come.

We are still suffering the debts of the 2007-9 GFC

The saving of the banks is the main reason for our debt problems of today. The GFC has not gone away as its debt remains and it has to be paid, so there are other measures to be implemented to attempt to make sure the private banks in Australia will not suffer. For the government there is too much at stake and other measures are the deliberate price hike of housing, where the private banks are able to double the size of loans while having to lower the interest rates. This means that the profit margins are being kept above their average earnings.

As the private banks also sell these mortgages for ready cash instead of waiting many years, they are able to loan out to more in housing loans, the State and Federal governments help out here by not opening up more land and subdivisions. This tends to increase demand for existing homes and the redevelopment of some that are being purchased just for the land, in many cases by foreigners.

The State governments love this situation as they can collect much more on land tax, stamp duty, all the while capital gains flow back into the tax collection of Federal governments.

What is happening in this housing boom, is the windfall from the extra cash collected by governments. They have along with the private banks devised another huge tax collection without having to pass it in the parliament or even reveal it plainly to the public. The public in return are thinking that the housing boom might line their pockets, and while this may happen in the interim period it will not work out that way in the long run.

Why this is self-negating in the long run for homebuyers and investors in real estate, is the looming and gradually increasing unemployment, especially among the young who at present are finding it hard to find a job. Finding a job that pays well is also fast disappearing over the horizon. Essentially, there is a push for lower wages being gradually implemented as well and this will see a new generation of poor, and underprivileged.

The Federal government is rearranging the status of the Australian public. There are now new classifications of what are "wealthy people"; this is piggy backed on the present "housing boom" whereby a pensioner who happens to live in one of the big cities is experiencing a house price rise interpreted as "wealth" that will attract more council rates. Further, if they happened to buy an investment property years ago for a retirement, it will now be assessed as assets that may well mean a reduction in the pension - which has already been tagged to be shrunk in the future.

What good will it do a pensioner who doesn't want to move, who has no control over falsification of his home value, and who earns a little from investments that may equal the basic wage, to be told he is now "wealthy" - when going out to a restaurant once a year is considered extravagant!? This is absurd treatment of a onetime taxpayer the only source of wealth for the nation now victimised as the excuse for a nation which has borrowed too much from private banks!

What you are also seeing in this story is the gradualism of shrinking incomes, the disappearance of good paying long term jobs, while the cost of almost everything is increasing. The governments are raking in the cash to reduce their borrowings ahead of more trouble, while the "reforms" they put in place will reduce the debt paying capacity of the public. The public debt is the highest in the "developed world" and all it needs is a further reduction in unemployment or pay to begin a landslide.

Low wage capitalism and slavery

While we wait for this eventual outcome the governments are engaged in inviting more immigration, with more enticements and assistance for resettlement of migrant workers who are being ripped off by unscrupulous employers. The attack on unions is reducing their ability to bring these happenings to the attention of the public, while plans are being made to invite more cheap labour into the country especially in the northern parts of the country.

Countries that will resist further immigration due to increasing austerity will be forced to accept immigrants from "regime change" war zones. Governments play on the sympathy of the general public, which has forgotten the huge disruption that America and its allies have deliberately carried out in Iraq and other countries, forcing people to flee from once stable and relatively secure countries that are now shattered into pieces. This activity will see an extra influx that their governments caused by these initial counterproductive activities.

Again, if you research the countries that have been attacked and brutalised, causing the spread of refugees to end up on your shores, we find it has all been done for resources and the fact that these countries had their own government-run public banks, and that they were doing very nicely. These were the real reasons, and not the falsification of suspicions of weapons of mass destruction; indeed, terrorism was born during invasions and murderous plunder.

When you add up all these inputs-hidden debts, austerity measures, unemployment, housing booms and busts, increased indirect taxes under the guise of stamp duty, and capital gains, the new "wealthy pensioner", the push for lower wages, the increase in immigration and the use of them for slave labour, the erosion of union power - you see the new poor.

There is the new poor generation of younger people, the older generation are undermined, the overloaded charity outlets, increased violence in the home or from invited terrorists in

Corporate And Political Plans For Lowering Wages In The Western World Allan R. Jones

RIGHT now, a distinct plan is in motion for the lowering of wages across the board in Western countries. Corporations and bankers are calculating the savings being made by off-shoring, not only with tax avoidance schemes - but for labour. There is advanced planning to put together a mosaic of suppliers in low wage areas of the world that can be economically drawn together to produce all kinds of goods and services to be sold in corporate owned conglomerates - like Walmart and Bunnings in the Western world.

Corporations have now increased their eligible workforce worldwide. Between the years of 1983 and 2015, the available workforce in the Western global sphere of influence has increased from 1.5 billion to above 3 billion. This extra influx of workers have come from places like India, Vietnam, Mexico, Romania, UAE, Thailand, China, even Russia and many others. Politicians contribute by the signing of secret trade deals, allowing the economic circumstances such as the increase of a pool of unemployment among the young, or the lowering immigrant 457 visa supervision, as well as extending the retirement age without providing for more jobs. These actions pit worker against worker in a scramble for jobs.

The tremendous effect of this worldwide plan, combined with the technological means of greatly improved communications, payment systems, and coordination of logistics involving shipping and other transport, has brought about for the first time in history the means whereby up to thirty countries can be involved in the production of one product, all being controlled from one building in one city whether New York, London, Paris or Sydney and all competing with each other for wages.

Examples are corporations like Toyota, Ford, Intel, Hewitt Packard, IBM, Coca Cola, Proctor and Gamble, Telstra, and Australia's four big banks. Invariably most if not all of the big corporations around the world are farming out work to the low-wage areas, then combining the production of products to sell in places like Walmart, Bunnings, Coles, and Woolworths, High tech IP shops, motor vehicle sales outlets, even direct mail order, or in fact any sales outlet where you can purchase low cost low wage products.

It is the very cheaply made products and services that are the problem, simply because it means very cheap labour, and the fact that it is Western corporations that are both making and selling these products anywhere - will impact on the wages in the West. This fast becomes a brake on any remaining high paying jobs left in the Western countries. This situation cannot be good for high wage demands in the countries expected to become the consumers of cheap labour products or services they once produced themselves at better wage levels.

There are three obvious actions that are unfolding and will accelerate in pace as unpayable debt resulting from a lower standard of living. The first will be the bank up of over-produced goods in the Western countries as the wages cannot extinguish available products at any price. The second will be the economic conditions that have been introduced by budget changes that have forced more and more people into the workforce without there being enough well paid work. Thus politicians will point toward the low wage work offered, but the amounts being paid will not match living wage expectations, consequently more policy enforced austerity will result. The third one is already with us in Australia, ever since the privatisation of the Commonwealth Employment Service in 1998. There has been a shift toward contractors to tap inexperienced and young workers from overseas set up on 457 visas or seasonal backpackers for exploitation usually on farm work. This move has created a underclass in Australia of wage slaves that clearly resembles the capitalist exploitation of the 1890s. The setting up of labour hire companies that source and supply labour to employers is permeating the landscape in many industries, a move which allows for an extra layer of exploitation whereby yet another corporate structure can reduce the wage received for work done by taking a cut out of the workers entitlement for themselves.

Deregulation of Banks and Industrial Relations in 1983

The overall postulated picture is that Western countries will be employed in "good paying white collar jobs" aka Paul Keating's statements in the 1983 deregulation era. This does not stand up to resulting developments either, as many of the jobs that are being off-shored are in fact white collar jobs, but those doing those jobs now will be pitted against a vast army of willing and waiting cheap labour sources in the yet untapped markets being cultivated by Western capitalists every day.

"Gradualism" is the catch phrase from the "Global" plotters and planners. It is happening over time and from say 1983 to 2015, we have all heard of the call centres, the bank customer service staff, and billing inquiries being made from Mumbai or Manila; but it goes much deeper. Look at Toyota which has over thirty thousand contractors and suppliers worldwide; some are owned by Toyota and others are subcontractors and all have to meet stringent deadlines and quality standards. There is a pool of trained and dedicated cheap labour and it is easy to understand that Toyota can pick and choose performance levels across such a range of competition for work.

From these few examples, given it is easy to imagine the ease of which labour and products will become global, as will the wage structures, the lower moving toward the higher and higher trending down until there is very little difference. Free trade agreements will provide the setting up of manufacturing or services in any country and by any global employee from any country, meaning that sources of labour will be global and located in any suitable country. At present it is not well known that wages in some industries in America or Japan already approach $7.00 -

A 7/11 store - at the centre of a cheap labour rort using foreign students. This is the new capitalism

$9.00 per hour as an example, while Walmart has its lowest paid worker in Bangladesh at 20 cents per hour x 14 hour day = around $30.00 per month, with 10 days holiday per year.

All the American auto manufacturers are now studying and implementing the Toyota model. This has not gone unnoticed by other companies all over the Western capitalist world. Specific training is now on the spot and production of qualified personnel is well under way globally, and while it is understood that cheap labour countries will demand increases in wages eventually, there is a time lag to reach developed country wage levels which are in decline. Further, there is always a pool of unemployed in all the countries concerned to slow any wage increase activity; thus a low wage level playing field will be created worldwide, with a potential to go lower not higher.

Pressure is being brought to bear on the developed countries' union organisations by politicians. The spectre of "we will go offshore" or "union corruption" dampening demands, is a reality being recognised by union bosses. So corporate pressure can be applied all the way up and down the production chain; the pool of workers elsewhere guarantees a much more compliant workforce; exchange student and corporate training programs are being developed with assistance from various governments in many countries including Australia so that their workforces can participate by entering the low wage level of this global "integration". An example is TAFE colleges in India.

Specialized contracting companies are already established

There are corporations that are wholly set up for contracting the hire of labour right through to the organization of production, health and safety, delivery times, packaging, transport and any other requirement that a major manufacturer may need to satisfy a market worldwide. Companies like Flextronics Incorporated is a leader in the worldwide engagement of low wage workforces for transnational companies. It has a revenue of $15 billion annually.

Such an integration of workers goes beyond media references of any declared enemies, as there are now scientists and engineers employed in Russia for $40.00 an hour taking the place of American scientists and engineers that would cost $120.00 an hour to work on American projects. The new program of seeking low wage employees knows no enemy, unless it interferes with profit margins or sources of resources.

Education standards in the Western world are being lowered, and made more expensive while Western labour wage rates have not moved very much at all since 1980. This was the very same year that the transnational export of jobs begun in earnest, there is remaining in the West very few good paying jobs in the global administration of low wage offshore production administration. There are some jobs in the area of capital investment based on profit outcomes from slave labour, or local housing speculation in derivatives and other debt instruments that tend to secure the private banks temporarily, but this can easily fail if job losses increase, or wages are reduced.

As none of this activity is helpful for the continuance of Western lifestyles based on an adequate income to meet rising cost of living, often there is no prospect for high paid work in the future. The predictions of economic collapse or failure can therefore

The massive escalation in house prices can only be kept up so long as wages continue to keep up with these rising costs; that means high wage jobs. These high paying jobs are now disappearing, and the collateral damage will be a collapse in house prices - due to the relocation of the means of production, sales, and even markets into low wage countries.

Wage reduction and unaffordable housing in the West

A future collapse in housing prices
Con't p. 5

is guaranteed by the drive for lower wages, off-shoring over time being the main instrument that will herd the working classes toward accepting lower wages. The boom in house prices suits only the banking investment class for their short term gains in selling inflated residential mortgage backed securities, or other debt instruments, giving them the capital to invest in shares of the profits coming from the exploited low wage initiatives.

But this is a last ditch capitalist move to save themselves. Round one was the 2007-9 GFC taxpayer bailouts which is also short circuiting itself; the selling of a mass of products to the Western world is solely dependent on high wage incomes. This is already being felt by the lack of increases from 1980 in wage levels, but the debt that will also mount up due to any future fall in wages. This is already being anticipated by governments and will see an escalation in foreclosures of homes, thus sounding the death knell to the investors riding on the back of homeowners at present buying RMBs.

It is obvious that government and the capitalists are working together to reduce the costs of production. This in turn will increase profits to corporations as long as the consumer in the West can afford to buy. The problem of overproduction that will soon arise, usually translates into a war where the excess productive capacity can be gobbled up in bombs and bloodshed, while corporate profits are increased. This is reluctantly supported by the working classes, due to unemployment resulting in volunteering or conscription with an income from a bankers' battlefield.

However, the next war will see global manufacturing bases widely dispersed around the globe, with only communication systems keeping them going. The collection of parts and pieces may be a problem due to interruptions of communications and transport. This is remedied by the military industrial complex locating in low wage production areas near the countries that have initiated world wars - such as for example the USA using Mexico, a low wage production base already a part of NAFTA.

Innovation and invention becomes corporate technological determinism

The main emphases of this discussion is the plan for lower wages, the way this will be implemented, and the end results. The very countries that led innovation and invention of most of the world's advanced products and are deserving of appropriate incomes, will be demoted to the ranks of low wage coolie lands. Other countries will compete to make the products that the corporations have acquired by means of being part of the family of corporate dictators, where capital can always be derived from the working classes by way of private banking debt, tax burdens, prevention or acquisition of technology and unfair competition.

Thus the direction of technical advancement will be determined only by corporations for profit. The effect of this is already being felt where genetically modified foods are destroying the organic natural and safe food production, where chemicals and pharmaceuticals are a panacea for every illness, oil dominated industries restricting alternate energies, the destruction of land and water resources due to the frantic fracking search for gas or coal, and the insidious attempts to employ robots to displace workers. Nowadays, Third World countries make robots to do away with higher wage areas of Western economies. Indeed, these are already employed in Western supermarkets.

The governments that attempt to pay global companies to stay in a high wage environments will be wasting their taxpayers' money. What they should be doing is investing in providing alternative industries that are not integrated into the global monopolies. This could be for example organic foods, and alternate medicines, these two especially suited to Australia with improved water distribution systems that have been on the drawing board since the 1930s; but to do this you need a public banking system, that can fund national initiatives and not the globalist dictatorship.

Austerity will eventuate - due to no interest in high wage job creation

'Austerity' is a plan taking place every day in Australia. We see the lowering of wage levels, the removal of entitlements and penalty rates, and adjustments to the pensions. There is 'same payment' for working day or night. All women and the 70 year olds must work, with refugees of capitalist imperial wars competing with the locals for wages. There is the weakening of union powers, the ramping up of the debt on housing, the collapse of certain parts of the economy - and on top, the competition of foreign workers in low wage countries.

The invasion of our economy by countries like China with new found wealth based on low wages profits can use this leverage to foreclose on parts of Western countries. All of this is an attempt to salvage the capitalist system which must always require competition and the reduction of costs in order to raise profits. Capitalism is being undermined due to mounting debts, competition for resources and markets, a burden of non-performing speculative investments and industrial upheaval. The cost of proxy wars is driving this insane system to full scale war as it has always done in the past. The impossibility of continuous profit based on fictitious debt gets out of hand due to collapsing leverage, ultimately resulting in a worldwide worker uprising against the capitalist system.

This Revolution is biggest since the Industrial Revolution

The move to the process of "integration" as economists will refer to this phenomenon is unprecedented in capitalist history; it can be likened to the industrial revolution for the disruption it will cause. Labour unions and workers will have to unite to protect their interests, but they will have to define their interests more clearly. Even excessive immigration of people's fleeing imperial wars are to be used to lower wages and add confusion to those who see only empathy rather than deliberate intensions to culturally distort and spread low wage slavery around the globe.

Research from the United States Business Council has pointed out that as far back as 2002, the numbers involved are staggering; it said that there are at least seven countries that have populations well over 100 million and these are rapidly entering the world markets. We may speak of China, Russia, Brazil, India, Indonesia, Bangladesh, Mexico, the former communist countries of eastern Europe, the former Soviet republics, plus there is the rapidly growing countries of Vietnam, Philippines, and Turkey where each of these have over 50 million each. This researcher also commented that the flow of workers up until 1980 was gradual, and at that time the wage and industrialisation was mainly national, not global.

The global workforce has drastically changed

The total of available, willing, excess workers is in the billions; they are all eager to get onto the imagined gravy train, and the capitalist corporations are equally eager to exploit them. They will be used to lower the wages of the Western world employees who still have a job and because of the increasing supply from each contributing country they can all be pitted against each other if they demand too much in wages. Thus union power is being eroded

Alarming as comments here are, it must be stressed that the capitalist and private banker elite have always exploited the working classes. The institution of private banking with its ability to create credit out of nothing was the foundation stone for the rise of the multinational corporation. As part of the elite structure of capital domination by the integration of banks and corporations, loans for them was no problem. Any cost in this lending between friends was treated as a tax deduction and one way or another the worker as borrower paved the way for these conglomerates with sweat, labour, blood, and taxes all to pay an illusory but legalised debt that never existed; until he asked for it from the bank, not a minute before did the bank have that loan capacity!

Once the penny drops and the reader sees the capitalist plot of a move to shift offshore all high wage production, it will be plain for all to see that there would be no interest in any job creation that results in a permanent good paying manufacturing or industrial jobs in Australia. Instead, politicians will blunder along deliberately allowing countries like China to take advantage of the wage competition that will develop among high wage countries and low wage countries. Cash strapped politicians will welcome China here for resources, food supply, or other global free trade interests, creating booms and busts by rise and falls of demand, all of which will impact on the lowering of entitlements and wages for workers in our country.

Austerity therefore is a plan not an accident. The whiteanting of workers within Australia has already been allowed to get a foothold, with the labour hire contactors who exploit the migrant workers on farms which supply the big supermarkets. All the while unions are collectively smeared, big corporations will claim immunity, but the contagion will spread. Eventually it will be aligned with the off-shoring of the higher wage earners and thus there will be a meeting of the exploited layers. This may result in a shadow boxing political debate about "budget repair" measures, but the end result will be crushing of the bottom layer of workers by the top-heavy layers to produce lower wages across the board.

Malcolm Turnbull: an ex banker for Prime Minister

The vastness of the conglomerates and low wage combinations

Even local large companies and entrepreneurs in each Western country are not going to withstand the conglomerates that can tap the connections they have in low wage offshore production. Combined with a web of fellow megalithic corporations which supply the very equipment and knowhow sourced from the low wage countries and which can be brought to bear; the multinational capital connections are all linked together to form one power. This is global power which makes a select club of exploiters. They are the sharks in the same pond with the sardines. This is especially so of the stock exchanges parasites, international banks and the labour racketeers.

Australia in particular is confronted with this multi-pronged attack on its living standards. The scramble for money to pay debt will accelerate, - while its ability to pay is undermined forcing the governments to borrow more from private bankers. This reduces living standards and wages again and the nation is deliberately hamstrung to increase national wealth by its own means of investment and so it turns to foreign investment. Thus it increases its debt burden again, and while this is going on the country will accept trade deals, tariff removal, that will contain the requirements to lower the pay-rates of labour. In this way, Australia will join those nations competing in a race to the bottom among billions of eager workers who will never find enough work.

Con't p. 6

One must bear in mind that this labour game is stacked against the worker anywhere in the world. In reality it was the worker who in the beginning that enabled the growth of the transnational conglomerates and in the first stages of growth the worker was indispensable to the battle of the titans. That was often sorted by warfare, and so the workers were paid well on this part of the journey. However the nature of the beast that has grown up on the back of labour will now cause them to beg in multitudes just for a chance to survive on a meagre wage.

Private debt creating banks are the driving force behind it all

From an earlier age in our history of the economic world, is the private bank, The Money Power. This institution no matter what its name in any country, applies the same historical leverage of being able to create nearly all of its money out of nowhere. It lends to governments who are afraid of questioning it. While it wields its Zombie Economics that makes no sense whatsoever, it freely funds the pockets of the corporations which help entrench its power. The ability of the Money Power to then make the fiat (created on the ledger) money appear by law to be real (because all that is bought and sold is real), is clear, but when the peoples of the world find they are slaves this also will be real, but it will be the result of that which was not real.

May this document be a warning to all that the time is approaching that will test our sanity. Will we all be fools without a paradise, men and women seemingly without a brain, slaves who supply our own chains? Will we accept all we are told, and will we say “what can I do” while doing nothing? Surely we have sacrificed enough in the fights for “freedoms” that end only in economic bondage? We can all learn today from many sources that it is the private debt-creating banks which are the main problem behind all our other problems and by removing this burden can rebuild our world of productive effort.

Australia need not support any of this global capitalist plot

Australia has always been under some colonial regime. In the past the “mother country” has extracted 600 railway wagon loads of gold to pay The Bank of England; we were involved in imperial wars aimed at reduction of competitors of British global trade. America also has come to our rescue with embargoes and sanctions against Japan resulting in another war. America remains in our country to control our top 20 performing companies plus most of our private banks by means of proxy directorships of at least 30% on each board, while extracting an annual defence debt to the Australian people of $70 billion dollars for equipment suiting the defence of American interests.

Colonisation has cost us our nation’s future so far, and politicians are again sucking up to a third contender - China.

While it is difficult to see that these three previous, past and future powers all are controlled by the money power in one way or another, the first two, the UK and America, are now willingly jumping into bed with China. The potential is life saving for the capitalist and the communist; both are willing participants. They will now exploit their varied abilities, technology and knowhow from the capitalists in exchange for cheap labour, with one aim - the preservation of the money power which has no allegiance to any of these countries in particular.

Australia is sandwiched in between these cooperating countries that seek to save the private banks again when public and private debt become unpayable to them as planned. Methods used for this saving of private banks are bailouts, haircuts, and bail ins. It passes the costs to the taxpayer and borrower of the bailouts, thus saving those capitalists who are in league with the banks. The plan is to reduce the cost of production by the use of cheap labour and between the two of these solutions the bankers and capitalists intend to survive, but at tremendous cost to everybody else.

This author has many times put forward the response to this Money Power with its creation of money from nothing. Money is ‘lent’ to the people at debt incurring interest, thus giving the private bankers a huge leverage over all others including the stupefied governments. The answer is so simple it is beyond belief that is has not been introduced long ago. The answer is for the government to take back the power to issue money, but also at the same time this money issue must not charge a profit of any kind, or if there is a small profit from the operation of such a bank, the profit should be paid to the government for public works.

As most of my readers know the government already has the power to issue its own money. This comes from the Australian Constitution, Part V section 51 subsections 4, 12, 13 ,20, 31. As for the application of interest or excessive charges this also has been established as a fallacy in Australian law, as established by the Royal Commission into Banking and Monetary Policy of 1937. The findings of this Commission had to refer to the presiding Justice Napier who had to interpret what was revealed: “This statement means that the Commonwealth Bank (at that time this bank was the central bank of Australia in the hands of the government) “can make money available to governments or to others on such terms as it chooses, even by way of a loan without interest, or even without requiring either interest or repayment of principle”.

of national sovereignty associated with the invasion more keenly, because he had a stake in the old Saxon system and has lost that. Today, we commonly find Australians apathetic about the loss of our jobs and industry to internationalist free trade initiatives. This is, at least partly, because employees mostly have no material stake in the organisations that they work for. Publicly listed companies are ‘owned’ by shareholders who, usually, have contributed nothing directly to the company but expect to financially benefit from it. If the board decides to ‘offshore’ production to lower costs, the employees will find another company to work for and feel no sense of loss. Under such circumstances, feelings of collective belonging and loyalty seem very misplaced.

The Norman Yoke

Importantly, The Wake reintroduces the concept of The Norman Yoke to modern readers. Kingsnorth includes an endnote to the book entitled ‘A Note on History’ in which he makes clear the profound effect that the Norman invasion had on English history. While it is true that the demographic profile of England was little changed after the events of 1066, many other aspects of English life did change significantly. The trajectory of England’s social evolution was also changed forever – and generally in ways that did not benefit the average English citizen. Kingsnorth points out:

In 21st century England, 70% of the land is still owned by less than 1% of the population; the second most unequal rate of land ownership on the planet, after Brazil. It is questionable whether this would be the case had the Normans not concentrated all of it in the hands of the king and his cronies 1000 years ago’. And; “Other Norman legacies remain with us too, or have only recently been purged from our society. Automatic hereditary monarchy, the ‘ownership’ of a wife by her husband, the inheritance of land and titles by the first-born son, the legal ownership of all land by the monarch; all are Norman introductions’.

In contrast to the grim reality of post -Norman England, mediaeval Iceland developed along lines that might have paralleled a Saxon or Saxon / Danish England if William had been defeated at Hastings. In the three centuries from Viking settlement to 1260 when the king of Norway took control, the Icelanders created a remarkably modern free state, governed by laws and notions of honour instead of warlords and kings. Iceland had no king, no lords, no peasants, a relatively flat economic structure - and the world’s oldest extant parliament, the Althing, which was established in 930AD.

As it was, England was fated for a very different future. Six hundred years later, following the First English Civil War, a group of Protestant radicals called The Diggers (or The True Levellers) were still claiming that the common people of England had been robbed of their birthright and exploited by a foreign ruling class. Gerrard Winstanley wrote for The Diggers;

“O what mighty Delusion, do you, who are the powers of England live in! That while you pretend to throw down that Norman yoke, and Babylonish power, and have promised to make the groaning people of England a Free People; yet you still lift up that Norman yoke, and slavish Tyranny, and holds the People as much in bondage, as the Bastard Conquerour himself, and his Council of War.”
- Gerrard Winstanley (1609-1676) from ‘The True Levellers Standard Advanced’.

For expressing such views, The Diggers leadership were beaten, arrested and killed. State power in England – and by extension, later in Australia – remained fearful of challenges to its authority and loyal to ideas that are foreign to – and rejected by – the nation’s people. The Norman Yoke is still with us today.

Conclusion

The Wake won the inaugural book of the year prize at the Bookseller industry awards. It was longlisted for the Man Booker Prize and the Folio Prize, shortlisted for the Goldsmiths Prize and won the Gordon Burn Prize in 2014.

It is highly recommended.

the streets, the setting up of trade zones in the country by foreign countries like China - where again the push will be for lower wages and colonial leverage attempts all aimed at lowering debt.

Does this activity cause you to mistrust the political parties within our parliament? Why is it that there is no goal for the country? The planned infrastructure will not eventuate due to hidden debt, given to private contractors who will be foreigners charging tolls. The housing bubble will deflate, and with it further debt and disruption. The lack of jobs will cause further social upheaval, resulting in the imposition of harsher laws. An attempt to stifle social media from subjective criticism is under way. A suspicion must form even in the most distracted mind that something is wrong?

It is time for Nationalism to put forward a vision for how the country should be governed. It must not be for foreign entities, nor for any other colonial master or masters. Nor should it be for private banks that need constant bottle-feeding with debt and neither for protracted warfare in parts of the world that mean nothing to Australia except the invited terrorism. We need no secret deals that could enslave and restrict freedoms and prosperity. We denounce the brainless zombies in the parliaments, who can only see gay marriage, “death cults” and union bashing as relevant issues while the Nation implodes.

Leveraging the past present and future

Government open ignorance of economic welfare is apparent when they allow the control of our largest banks to be in the hands of foreigners, as well as that of our retail food suppliers.

Other ineptness is in the suggestion that we need foreign investment. This is another word for corporate takeover and privatisation, as it is the foreign corporations and not other countries that have anything to invest in Australia, and that will be only in their interest.

We Australians are also encouraged to join in wars on once peaceful countries that have their own government banks and oil and other resources, and we join this war-mongering because of the ability of the United States to create as much debt as it needs to buy influence and vast amounts of war equipment, when we could have lent to ourselves the same amount without interest, without having to crawl to other nations and suffer debts and violence because of it.

All this poor governance has been repeated in Australia in the past, in the 1890’s, and in the 1930’s and it was caused by the same old activity, the private bankers had over-leveraged their investments and increased the debt upon the public.

Then came the collapse resulting in the governments of the day having to load up the taxpayers with debt to save those private bankers. The only reprieve from this iniquity for small Australian business and our farmers and workers, was during the time of the Commonwealth Government Bank which only existed for eleven years of prosperity 1911 to 1924.

So-called ‘leftist’ Greek PM Tsipras - selling Greece’s assets to the bankers

The solution

This is why the Australia First Party has adopted the policy of introducing back into Australian life and prosperity a government public bank, a bank that does not have to make a profit, and therefore does not need to have a huge national debt to use as its deposits, a bank that ensures the country is never in debt. Instead it will use the National Credit which is the wealth of all national assets, in conjunction with the public credit of the people and it will operate on the principle of whatever is physically possible can be made financially possible, at the lowest cost to the people, a non-profit bank a people’s bank.

objects to his sons going off to join the ‘fyrd’ (local army) because he needs them on the farm, but when it becomes apparent that they have been killed, he implies – and possibly believes - that they went to fight with his blessing. He is shown as being arrogant, driven and unforgiving; qualities which initially appeal to those who join his motley band of rebels, but which ultimately repel them.

These themes are easy to discern and provide a good foundation for the story of a complex man. There are other, less obvious, themes woven into the story too, and from the nationalist perspective these are very interesting.

Identity

On one level, the whole story could be easily viewed as a tale of identity and of mediaeval identity politics. Buccmaster and his followers regard the Norman French as foreign and unspeakably alien to their culture and way of life. And so they are. Their language is different. Their clothing and customs are strange. They have very different views about who gets to own property and the rights of those who don’t. And they have come to rule, to assume the sovereignty of the land and to impose their beliefs.

By contrast, Buccmaster’s most loyal follower – the boy called Tofe - is a descendant of earlier Danish invaders. He is not of ‘Anglisch’ blood, but Buccmaster reconciles this by observing that the Danes were culturally closer to the Saxon English than the ‘ingenga Frenc’ and that Tofe himself was a ‘denisc boy, becum anglisch’. Historically this rings true. The Danes had already imposed their own laws over the northern part of England well prior to the arrival of Canute – which led to this part of the country being called the Danelaw. But their culture, laws and customs were closer to the established Saxon ways than those of the Normans. Later kings officially converted to Christianity. The Normans were altogether alien and were

The Greek People should celebrate the occasion to default and invite the world to have a holiday there as it is indeed an occasion for freedom.

The Greek people should celebrate that a default may occur and work to get out of the European Union and go their own way. They will not take long to become peaceful and prosperous, no matter what they call their currency, or whether they join another organisation such as the BRIC - Brazil, Russia, India and China - they should celebrate and invite the world to have their holidays in Greece, this will quickly build up foreign reserves of cash to combat the unforgiving treacherous banksters of the world who hate opposition widely despised as a result.

If Greece ultimately ‘defaults’, so should we. It is the beginning of freedom.

Pagan, Indo-European deity, the Green Man. Commonly found throughout Europe and who inspired Robin Hood style myths.

In Buccmaster’s case, this resentment is exaggerated because he identifies the invaders with the coming of Christianity to England. The story makes it clear that by 1066, Christianity was already well established in England but Buccmaster rejects it completely. He is a worshipper of the old pagan gods who talks to trees and hates the priests and their hypocrisy. Throughout the story he is haunted and driven by visions of Saxon gods and the voice of Wayland the Smith, who – family legend holds – gave a rune-inscribed sword to Buccmaster’s grandfather. In one chapter, Buccmaster also seeks relief from the heat by immersing himself in a stream in the dead of night. While in the stream, he experiences a transcendent experience where he sees the ‘eald god’ Odin and understands that this is a sovereign blessing of him and his mission. Again, there is a historical basis for the scene in that all of the Saxon kings of England, from Hengest and Horsa through to Edmund Ironside all claimed descent from Odin. This was true even after the later kings officially converted to Christianity.

trying to impose their laws and way of life on a native population is one which obviously has parallels today. Another subterranean theme running through the story, but relevant to today, is that of place and territory.

People and Place

Buccmaster hates the invaders and can inspire others like him to kill them because they have intruded on his lands and his space. There is no suggestion that he has a pathological hatred of them simply because they are different. It’s the fact that they are different and in his space that’s relevant. This becomes clear when the reader compares Buccmaster’s response to the Normans (homicidal loathing) to his opinion of the Welsh. The Welsh get a couple of passing references throughout the story and are clearly regarded as foreign, uncivilized and immensely different. But they are in their own place and Buccmaster is comfortable with that – even considering the possibility of an alliance with them at one stage, but dismissing it due to their apparent unreliability. Buccmaster is also clearly attached to his own lands, exhibiting a spiritual attachment to The Fens that springs from his heritage there. While on the run, he and his band spend some time deep in the forests, hiding out and preparing for their next (undefined) fight. But some time later they return to the Fenlands and Buccmaster is inspired and motivated by being back in his own territory.

The theme is one that will resonate with Australian nationalists. Our opponents routinely portray us as slack-jawed haters; xenophobes afraid of anyone ‘different to us’. This is nonsense, of course. Our love of our country and people is a positive thing and we ask nothing more than to be allowed to evolve as a people, free from the imposition of foreign masses, laws and cultures. We may be descended from people in Europe or elsewhere but our spiritual inspiration lies here, on the old continent. Many recent reviewers of The Wake find nothing to like or admire in Buccmaster of Holland and - by any estimation - he is far from perfect. But despite his obvious character flaws, I found myself cheering him on at every turn, hoping that in the end he’d overcome his egotism and throw in his lot with Hereward – whose deeds haunt a jealous Buccmaster throughout the later part of the story and provide stark contrast to Buccmaster’s own lack of effective strategy or action. A big part of his appeal, then, is in the essentially human love for his own people and place that he shows consistently throughout the story.

Nothing to lose

Another theme relevant to contemporary Australia is the apathy of those who have no material stake in their society. In one short episode, Buccmaster and his gang arrive at a village of English peasants who are enjoying themselves in a simple harvest festival.

They are ‘steppan and smercan’ (Or dancing and smiling) and seem unconcerned about the arrival of the Normans. When Buccmaster appeals to them for help in fighting the invaders, the villagers refuse – saying that none of them owned any land anyway and were formerly forced to support their Saxon lords, so they are no worse off under the new regime. This reaction enrages Buccmaster with predictable results. He feels the loss

AUSTRALIA FIRST PARTY

THE Australia First Party has participated in the various Reclaim Australia and similar rallies in recent months. The party has kept its independence and initiative in dealing with the audiences and the leaders.

The party's aim has been to intersect with a large number of people who have seen an immigration problem in Islamic migration but all the while seeking to lead them into a general opposition to the immigration process. This has brought us into conflict with the leaders who basically and generally stand for 'Diversity Minus Islam'. Of course, taking Islam out of the pot — still leaves the diverse (sic) society to the detriment of Australianity.

THE unity of the nationalist forces remains a crucial goal of the party. The party has operated its united front tactic in dealing with all sorts of patriotic people, but it pursues the goal of unification with the vanguard nationalists.

The unity of genuine people can be achieved if there is the will to do it.

Australia First Party is the core of this unity. However, the party remains completely open to genuine people from smaller groups to take roles and contribute to overall development. The party sees itself as a vehicle for the service of the Australianist ideal which wages political struggle.

The Eight Core Policies Of Australia First: A Programme And A Method For National Rebirth!

Whatever will benefit Australia, that we are for; whatever will harm Australia, that we are against. William Lane

2 THE Eight Core Policies of Australia First are the basis of association for the party. They are (with explanations and the implied ninth point) as follows:

1 Ensure Australia Retains Full Independence

Protect our sovereignty (national, constitutional and personal) and maintain an adequate defence, whilst being reasonable and fair in our nation's international dealings.

2 Rebuild Australian Manufacturing Industries

This is the only way we can be self-sufficient. It will provide jobs for our children, and help buy back the farm and allow Australia to be free of foreign debts. Our infrastructure has been run down over many years - it must be rebuilt. We must improve the practicality and relevance of our educational systems, and target government support for industry to diversify, innovate, perform and expand. We recognise that small business is fundamental to this policy. A satisfactory financial environment is also urgent and essential.

3 Control Foreign Ownership

Bring foreign ownership and investment back under control.

4 Reduce and Limit Immigration

Immigration mistakes can be big long-term mistakes. Immigration policy must take into account social cohesion, employment opportunities, urbanisation and environmental issues

5 Abolish Multiculturalism

End the divisive, government-funded and institutionalised policy of multiculturalism.

6 Introduce Citizen-Initiated Referenda

Amend the Australian Constitution such that the people can initiate a constitutional referendum which, if approved by the Australian people, will amend the Australian Constitution. This simple step will confirm the political authority of voters and make legislators aware that they are the servants of the Australian People, not their masters. The people directly should also possess the sovereign right and the power to initiate other legislation

7. Strengthen the family

Promote policies that strengthen and protect the traditional family.

8 Strive to Rebuild A United Australia

Promote policies that recognise the interdependence of city and country.

9 Democratise Other Policy Issues

All other policies (non-core policies) are matters of free conscience and are not binding upon Australia First's future parliamentarians or councillors who are to represent their electorates.

Issues of public interest on which Australia First needs to formulate policy will be canvassed with the party membership, and plebiscites conducted where deemed appropriate by the party's National Council. The party also permits branches to formulate specific electoral policies or community policies not inconsistent with the Eight Core Policies.

From time to time, the party will issue material that provides interpretation of the core policies. This interpretative material would reflect the spirit of the party.

The organizational purpose for this statement of policy and system for policy creation is simple: Australia First does not require weighty tomes which change from month to month, as do the programmes of the Establishment parties and those who ape them. It requires a focus for action and for unity within the party.

Australia First is to build a new national movement. Practicality is method.
